WETS GIVE UP FIGHT.

Overriding of President's Veto Shows Public Sentiment.

(By United Press.)

WASHINGTON, Oct. 28.—It is pretty freely admitted here today that those who had hoped for a suspension of war time prohibition over the holidays have given up the fight, following the action of the House late yesterday in overriding President Wilson's veto of the war-time prohibition enforcement measure.

The President took the position that war time measures should not be extended into peace times, and suggested that the matter of prohibition be treated separately.

In vetoing the bill President Wilson wrote:

"In all matters having to do with the personal habits and customs of our people, we must be certain that the established process of legal change are followed.

"In no other way can the salutary object sought to be accomplished by great reforms of this character be made satisfactory and permanent."

FLORIDA IS LOOKED TO FOR SUGAR STOCK

NEW YORK PAPER SEES RELIEF FROM SHORTAGE

Cheap Sugar Has Prevented Development in State Heretofore

The unprecedented sugar shortage which prevails at this time has turned the eyes of America's sugar men to Florida as a possible source of supply for the much needed "sweet crystal," says the New York Globe.

There are large areas of good land in southern Florida below the frost line, where the soil and temperature conditions are very favorable to the raising of sugar cane, and several projects are now in course of preparation which will have a considerable influence on the sugar supply of this country. Engineers have been at work for several months past gathering data and making plans for the erection of mills for the grinding of sugar cane, and it has been definitely announced that at least two of these mills will be in operation before January 1, 1922.

Cane can Be Grown

Sugar cane can be grown successfully in many parts of Florida, as has been proved repeatedly during the past twenty years, but no large modern mill has ever been erected because of the "cheap sugar" which has come to the United States in years past from Cuba and other West Indian islands. Now, however, when sugar is scarce throughout the world, and Cuba herself demands about 7 cents a pound for the raw sugar, Florida's opportunity seems to have arrived, it is declared.

The consumer of sugar does not realize where the supply comes from. All he does know is that his grocer will not sell him more than a pound at a time, and may refuse to sell even that much. But the sugar refiner realizes the long, hard work which has to be accomplished before sugar can be actually obtained from a tract of land seeded to sugar cane.

Slow-Growing Plant

Sugar cane is a slow-growing plant; it takes about ten months to mature in Florida. Its stalks grow from ten to twelve feet high and about two inches in diameter. Its sap contains about 12 per cent of "sugar" or "sucrose," as the chemists call it. The cane is cut in lengths, making it easy to handle, and dropped down a chute leading to crushers. The crushers tear and shred the cane before permitting the cane to reach the squeezing rollers by which the "juice" is crushed from the stalks. The juice is treated with chemicals, boiled down to a thick consistency, filtered, and again boiled down until
